No lines over seemed half so beauti hal as these which hung over the wall that inclosed the patch of garden ground belonging to Sutherland Villa, where he Falklands lived. The trees were old, gnarled, crippled, broken and split, and no year paused without Margaret Falkland saving 'This must be the last year of our blace! It is impossible that they can go on flowering in this way any longer." And yet when next year came the trees seemed more vigorous than ever, and tossed their plumed blossoms and flung their fragrance about in still more generous profusion.

They flourished to the injury of every thing clas in the garden, for they overshadowed the borders, but for the one week in which they were in perfection it was such perfection that there never could be any question of lepping off projecting branches. They were covoked by all theilower leving passarshy. Every unfar ous person in the reighborhood had the eye on them, and not infrequentive liss fine re! Tradesmens boys with ntefar one person in the reighborhood had his eye on them, and not infrequently his fing is. Tradesmens boys with barrows drive them up on the parement beneath the garden will to form a basis of operation, and Mr British for his fowns while his purveyors juvenile assistant stood on the barrow which was conversing them, plucked great handfule of blace for himself and frierds, fore down branches and stroved the presented with runnel fragments.
